Interpretive Text

Compared to other new mothers, these test results suggest that this individual is 5 to 17 times more likely to develop depression or to currently have depression.
--

Scoring and Interpretation Information

Mothers who score 13 and above are likely to be suffering from a depressive illness of varying severity. At a score of 13 there is an 80% chance that the mother has depression. Scores 13 and above represent an increased risk of developing depression of between 5 and 17 times the general population compared to new mothers. The EPDS score should not override clinical judgment. A careful clinical assessment should be carried out to confirm the diagnosis. Results consist of a total score as well as short interpretive text based on the cut off score of 13. It is important to always look at the client's response to question 10, which pertains to suicidal thoughts.
